There was a time when you couldn't be in the Club without hearing the tell-tale clack of Cuban heels on the wooden floors, feel the forceful reverberations from the slamming open of the Main Bar doors, and the risk (or reward) of receiving a full smacker on the lips was always in the air. This was the Bernie era.

Small in stature but larger than life, with a penchant for leopard print and love for chicken soup, in his own words, his job was 'just being Bernie'. The lessons he taught – that 'Our job is yes, you can have whatever you want' and that 'nothing good happens after 2am' – stand the test of time.

When the world lost Bernie in 2017, it lost a little piece of magic that will never be replaced. As Stephen Fry so aptly put it, he was 'five foot nothing with a heart twice the size of Soho Square'. Many of us were lucky enough to know him. But whether you did or didn't, welcome to Bernie's where his legacy lives on.

Bernie Katz, the Prince of Soho

'Alright love?'
